

I am very pleased with the strict parameters that New Jersey chooses to enforce, and am happy that they exceed the federal limits. Any proponent of weakening the DO NOT CALL statute is against personal privacy and conducting ones home life in an unharrassed atmosphere. Before the DO NOT CALL law went into effect, I could count on dozens of calls each night and weekend (which, of course, I would let me answering machine intercept). Now that the law is in effect, I can be fairly certain the any person calling me is doing so for a reason that I requested, and is not wasting my time to determine that they are selling a good or service that I have no intention of buying. Thank you Governor Cody of New Jersey for making my home life richer and less interrupted by unwanted solicitations. I hope that the FCC will take this comment into consideration when examining the federal law governing the treatment of electronic solicitation.
